Highlights

What we Discovered

Findings

- Resources for people seeking recovery:

  Friends of Recovery New York is trying to build recovery capital in New York State. We know there is prevention and treatment, but what happens after someone has been through treatment? Where are the supports for those people? Several speakers mentioned this lack of resources for those leaving treatment.

- What works for people fighting addiction/sustaining recovery?

  - Community resources like Columbia Pathways to Recovery
  - Family support
  - Greater community support network
  - 12 step programs
  - Methadone treatment
  - Therapy including Eye Movement Desensitization Reprocessing (EMDR)

- What do people who suffer from addiction and families need?

  - Education—parents are taught about giving birth and raising infants, but 15 years down the road, there is no education.
  - Support—when families and friends unite to support their struggling loved one it makes a world of difference
  - Support for people who suffer from addiction and other co-occurring mental health disorders
  - Treatment on Demand
What we Discovered (continued)

Barriers faced:
- Stigma: Why are hospitals not treating overdose and addiction like any other chronic illness?
- In order to get into treatment you must fail first.
- There are many hoops to go through to get into treatment and there is often only a short window of time that an individual will feel ready to be treated for their addiction
- Insurance often does not cover addiction or mental health diseases
- Counties, states do not communicate well and sometimes there is even competition for Medicaid funding

"My child had many hopes and dreams and not one of them was to be addicted to drugs."

"We must keep telling our stories and sharing the hope of recovery."

Recommendations
- Storytelling is a highly effective tool at ending stigma and it should continue
- This forum should continue to bring needed changes on a local, statewide and federal level
- Dutchess County is currently operating an addiction diversion center which could be brought to Columbia County
- These conversations must continue in meetings concerning children and the field of education
- Approach to addiction needs to move from punitive to compassionate
- Possibility of using libraries as a place to share information and also support people struggling with addiction or in recovery to help them access needed resources including job preparation and training
